

City may limit size of upper floors

But critics argue the proposal amounts to taking away property rights.

ANNA MARIA — People building new homes or remodeling and enlarging existing ones may find that they can't make their third floors as large as they used to be able to.

If the city commission goes along with a planning and zoning recommendation that grew out of Feb. 17 meeting, the large, rectangular, straight-walled homes now being built would no longer be allowed.

"Only 50 percent of the structure may exceed 27 feet in height based on the square footage of the main level not exceeding 27 feet in height," is the exact wording in the proposed ordinance that the P&Z board will recommend.

The main level refers to the main living level. In newer homes, since FEMA regulations dictate that the living space has to be elevated, if you had two stories over parking, the upper-most floor could be only 50 percent as large as the main living floor.

This restriction didn't sit

CORTEZ — It was standing room only under sunny skies at the 27th Annual Cortez Commercial Fishing Festival last weekend, where visitors cracked crab claws, danced to down-home music, shopped for nautical art and learned what makes the historic fishing village special.

A record crowd of 24,000 enjoyed the weekend festival, taking boat tours of the working waterfront and guided tours of the Florida Maritime Museum and admiring Caribbean-colored traditional wooden boats built by hand.

In keeping with the festival theme, "Claws," a crabber demonstrated how to HOLMES BEACH — For the second time in five months, county officials closed the Manatee Beach pier, but this time they said it must be removed and replaced.

In meeting with county commissioners Thursday, Charlie Hunsicker, director of the Natural Resources Department, said, "Because of continued deterioration to the pier structure since the last inspection, this report recommends removal of the existing pier followed by new construction to replace the original footprint at a higher elevation, as required by current state permit requirements."

He presented four options:

- Option 1: Demolition and removal, $670,000;
- Option 2: Repair existing pier, $1,683,000;
- Option 3: Rebuild pier over top of existing pier, $1,490,000;
